Rebuilding Together and National Center for Healthy Housing Announce Strategic Alliance at CGI America Meeting in Chicago

Commit to Repairing 2,400 Homes Using Energy+Health Practices and to Training 500 Volunteers

Chicago - June 7, 2012 – Rebuilding Together, along with the National Center for Healthy Housing (NCHH), today announced their Energy+Health program—committing to make 2,400 older, run-down homes of low-income homeowners, safer, healthier, and more energy efficient. The team will also train 500 Rebuilding Together volunteers nationwide in the Energy+Health practices.

“This integrated initiative will incorporate Energy+Health repairs into Rebuilding Together affiliates’ core operations—offering homeowners access to safety, health, and energy measures as part of the rehabilitation services they receive at no-charge,” said Gary Officer, President and CEO of Rebuilding Together.

The strategic alliance of the two organizations will produce 2,400 Energy+Health home renovations, build the capacity of 50 Rebuilding Together affiliates, and educate 500 Rebuilding Together volunteers over three years. The announcement, which took place at the Clinton Global Initiative event, CGI America 2012, is the first step in the three-year partnership.

“This commitment puts the principles of Energy+Health into practice to protect those at highest risk of hazards in their homes,” said Rebecca Morley, Executive Director of NCHH.

Nine Rebuilding Together affiliates have been selected as learning communities to refine and pilot test a set of 60 home modifications. The modifications are designed to prevent debilitating and costly injuries such as falls, health problems such as asthma, and enable elderly residents to age in place. Energy efficiency upgrades will help residents conserve energy and save scarce dollars currently spent on heating and cooling.
